

The net neutrality rules mustn't be gutted by an over caffeinated jittery former Verizon lawyer, drinking from a so-called "infamous" coffee mug, who was appointed by obviously demented cheeto-in-chief to help boost corporate profits over consumer rights and all things decent like apple pie and bunny rabbits and hugs. When the government gets in bed with corporate greed bad things happen like the last housing bubble... that put the entire world into a long and protracted recession with devastating effects on families and communities and eliminated the savings of millions of people. Too many laws are bad, but laws to make complicated to monitor and obfuscated concepts like preferential net access has the shades of corporate censorship... similar to how communist countries censor their free access to ideas on the internet to prevent their citizens from educating themselves about local and world issues as well as the best recipe for french toast not associated with the food network that pays to influence the ISP's directing of consumer internet access through differential access speed.
